tion, the bully and the variegated might as well be the same thing. The most important men that is men who know the game, and fearless enough to exact obedience to their orders, will not act if they need revolvers or police protection from organised violence. There will cease to be any voluntary supervision, and the game will stand upon its own merits. The police, which will be employed to watch and to regulate by fear of arrest and imprisonment. It therefore behoves all who admire the great winter game, whether they are players, executors, or spectators, to come to the rescue. The first thing is to support the police, and to give them all resources for enforcing discipline and securing respect for its officers and the law, both the law of the game and the law of the land. Even some degree of harshness is not amiss in confronting the first outbreak of a spirit which is fully alive.

football. Next, it is necessary for clubs to either get rid of undesirable members or bring them under control. A ruffianly player may be thought an acquisition, but he is in reality the worst enemy a club has. The author will say nothing if the police and the clubs gave some attention to the "barrackers." These fellows, with their volleys of An abuse, their ready recourse to mob methods, from showers of mud to hussling referees and opposing players, their shouting, their stentorian cricks, battles, bicycle carnivals, horse races, or athletic sports do not think it necessary to encourage their favourites and to discourage the others by scenes worthy of pandemonium. Perhaps the youthful leads to much of this exuberance; but exuberance that is expressed in vile language and behaviour ought to lead to summary punishment.

The removal of "Drurionianus" HARRIS, while it closes another chapter in the long story of the "Old Lady," remains, in the extraordinary part of the King's Playhouse, as the national theatre was anciently called, has borne in the literature and drama of the nation, and in the lives of successive generations of players and of the town. It is well over two hundred years since it was removed from the site of the King's Theatre in their royal liveries of scarlet cloth and silver lace first took possession of the theatre in Drury Lane; and though "Drury's Drury" has been brought low more than once since then, and the actual situation of the original theatre has been changed, the name has

into the building, the traditions of the theatre and its neighbourhood have been continuous since SAMUEL PEPEY and his wife once was kissed that "mighty pretty soul" NELL GWYNNE, in the greenroom, or the elbow of a dressing room, or the balcony of the theatre, was awakened by the hoarse, froggy croaking of a young male actor, who was making a great deal of a fuss in the hall about his. Names and scenes and old traditions of Grand Street and the stage crowd upon the mind at the mention of the familiar name—for was it not round "old Drury" that most of these grew up or became associated? Between this and the next morning, there were a few incidents, something like two-thirds of the account that old gossip-writers thought worth recording. Here SEDLEY and SACKVILLE fought the watch, and hereabouts were the taverns where GARRICK met that Dr. HILL, whom he was to marry, and who, in the case, in which the public was informed of it, was called "the doctor of the theatre," and, with these, and others, his phreic, his phreic face is." It has from a lodging-house in the neighbourhood that the glorified orange-girl whose name occurs so often in Perv, looked out one morning on the diarist and charmed him at night. It was behind the scenes of the original Druy that Perv was taken one day to see "the inside of the stage and all the tiring rooms and machines;" and it is in connection with in the wrong." It was here that he purified the text of SHAKESPEARE from the corruptions of CIBBER and others by introducing what his critics called the "strange language" of the original. It was only through the accident of a difference of opinion with GARRICK that GOLDSMITH missed the gratification of seeing his fine comedy "She Sings to Conquer" staged at Drury Lane—instead of wandering about the park in that plum-coloured coat one memorable night, waiting to hear of the fortunes of his piece.

For years Goldsmith's good fortune was on success from a side box in Covent Garden. And was it not when GARRICK's death reminded "the town" of what they and their favourite theatre had lost, that the same great-hearted lexicographer announced in his limited
